The coronavirus pandemic has presented us with unprecedented challenges. We’ve felt its effects at work, home, and in every other aspect of our lives. Felician University’s Center for Innovation and Professional Studies is offering two micro-courses for Continuing Medical Education (CME) credits to help working healthcare professionals and people with interest navigate the complexities of the current pandemic. These two courses, Ethics and the Pandemic and The Pandemic, Injustice, and What It Means to be Human, were developed by award-winning author, professor, and bioethicist Dr. Charles Camosy.

Ethics and the Pandemic

In this self-paced course, participants will explore the massive and heartbreaking implications of our choosing to be guided by certain ethical values (and rejecting others) during the pandemic.

The Pandemic, Injustice, and What it Means to be Human

The pandemic has highlighted & accelerated numerous kinds of injustices, especially for those who were already in vulnerable positions in our culture. In this self-paced course, learners focus on several important injustices related to the pandemic.

- 100% online
- Self-paced
- Can be completed in as little as 2 hours
- Earn CME credits for each course (can count as ethics credits)

This activity has been approved for AMA PRA Category 1 Credits™.
